Sue Kushner knows strong families are the building blocks of our communities.

Strong Families, Stronger Communities

Sue Kushner is the second oldest of seven children raised by a single mom in rural upstate New York. She knows, first hand, how important strong families are to our schools, our houses of worship, our public safety and our local businesses. Strong families are the building blocks of successful and strong communities.

Among her siblings are a police officer, construction worker, local college professor, nurse, musician, kindergarten teacher and Sue, a lawyer committed to standing up for all families.

Family Court Matters

As a lawyer for Albany County Child Protective Services, a former Albany City School Board member and now a Public Defender in Family Court, Sue knows family court matters. She also knows the importance of listening, being fair and working with families to produce the best results for all involved.

She has seen first-hand the challenges our families face. She knows how complex the legal system can be to even the most educated in our community. As a family court judge, Sue will be there to serve our families and to make what goes on in court easier to understand.

Cooking With Sue was an after-school cooking program for Albany City School students that Sue started and helped fund to teach middle-school youth to cook and be self-sufficient.

Sue, Steve and their three children, Michael, Theresa and Steve, Jr., all of whom graduated from Albany City Schools.

Standing Up for All Families

Sue believes in family. She and her husband of over 30 years, Steve Allinger, have raised three children. But, ask any of their kids' friends or the families Sue has worked with throughout her career, and they will tell you that Sue is like a second mother to all of them. Whether its legal advice, helping with homework, putting clothes on a child's back or cooking a meal, Sue stands up for all families.
